TRAIN AND TRACK.

The railroads of the United States bought 80,551,000 cross ties in 1905. The federal supreme court recently rendered a decision sustaining Georgia's law prohibiting the running of freight trains on Sunday. As the result of frequent railway accidents between Brussels and Namur many passengers by that route now wear large caps bearing their names and addresses placed to their coats in order that there may be no difficulty in establishing their identity. Every snowstorm in winter, especially if the snow be damp, blocks the switches in the railroad yards and delays trains. A Boston inventor now has perfected a plan to heat the oil pipes will not chill as do pipes filled with steam, and the high pressure is not required.

THINGS THEATRICAL.

"The Tourists," a new musical production, is to be the summer attraction at the Lyric in New York.

Channing Pollock's clever and successful play, "The Little Gray Lady," is being turned into novel form.

Henry Woodruff personally owns most of the "properties" used in the first and last acts of "Brown of Harvard." Those include the Harvard flag and other college emblems.

Henry Miller and Margaret Anglin believe in "trying out" plays before deciding upon casting the fortunes of a season upon one. Recently Miss Anglin gave a few trial performances of William Moody's "A Sabine Woman."

Alla Nasimoff, the famous Russian actress who created little short of a sensation in New York last winter as leading woman with the exiled Russian players, will be a star in English next season.

The Shuberters are rapidly deciding upon their new attractions for next season. Three musical plays are announced for fall production. The first is "The Snow Man," from the pen of Stanislaus Stange and Reginald De Koven.

A Mental Transition

(Original.)

In the cafe of one of the prominent clubs of New York sat two members, Mr. Hyland and Mr. Prindle, both considerably past middle age, engaged in earnest conversation. They were in one respect similarly situated. Mr. Hyland had an only son and heir to his large fortune. The son had loved ten years before a young lady who on the eve of their wedding had died suddenly. Mr. Prindle had a daughter who had suffered the loss of a lover, and her father feared that her mind would be affected in consequence of her affliction. Mr. Hyland earnestly desired his son to marry in order that the estate might be kept in the family, while Mr. Prindle believed that the only hope for his daughter was in having her affections drawn from the dead by some living lover. But, though both fathers had done everything in their power to bring about these results, they had thus far signally failed.

At a table so far distant that the speakers supposed their words would not be heard sat a young man with a pointed beard such as is often worn by men who practice in the fine arts. He arose and, advancing to Messrs. Hyland and Prindle, bowed and said: "Gentlemen, pardon me. Your interest in your subject has caused you to speak louder than you supposed, and I have overheard you. If you will permit and give me your assistance I would like to try to bring about a love match between these two living people."

The stranger was not repelled, and after some preliminary conversation the three adjourned to a private room, where an agreement was entered into between them. The stranger asked if they could furnish likenesses of the two who had died, and they responded that they could, promising to send them the next morning to the address which the gentleman's card read, "Edwin Larned, studio building." It was also arranged that photographs to be furnished from time to time by Mr. Larned should be placed conspicuously in the Hyland and Prindle domiciles.

Not long after this Lucy Prindle went into her father's private den and noticed on his desk the photograph of a young man. She gazed at it for some time and asked her father whom it represented. He told her that it was Henry Hyland, the son of a friend of his, and wished to know why she asked. She burst into tears and went out of the room. The likeness was Henry Hyland's, so artfully altered that there was a slight resemblance to her dead lover. About the same time Henry Hyland noticed in his mother's bedroom the picture of a young lady that resembled him of his dead love. He was informed that she was Miss Lucy Prindle, an estimable girl Mrs. Hyland had met and favored.

Within a few weeks these pictures were replaced by others still further resembling those who had passed away. The artist had left the likeness of the living, skillfully weaving in a resemblance to the dead.

Then one day Mrs. Hyland announced to her son that company was expected for dinner, and when the guests arrived among them was Lucy Prindle. Henry and Lucy looked at each other with the keenest interest, and both seemed pleased when they found that they were to be dinner companions.

In the company was Mr. Larned, who during the dinner carefully studied the features of both young Hyland and Miss Prindle.

When Lucy Prindle returned to her home she went directly to her father's room to study again Hyland's picture and was surprised to notice that it looked more like her lost one than before. It was another picture put there in her absence and had been made by the ingenious Larned. Henry Hyland went out of town for a few days after the dinner, and when he returned went to his mother's room to have a look at Lucy's likeness. It also had been replaced by one more nearly giving the features of her he treasured in his heart.

Then Henry Hyland called on Miss Prindle and spent a pleasant evening. They spoke of the pictures, Henry asserting that Miss Prindle resembled his lost love, she making the same statement with regard to him. This they afterward mentioned to their parents, and it was repeated to the artist.

"There is not the slightest resemblance in the originals," said Larned. "That is an impression I have created by successive slight changes in the pictures that have been placed before them. I have wished to impress."

The parents of Henry Hyland and Lucy Prindle continued to devise means to bring them, together, and the photographs of the living were constantly growing more like the dead. So slight were the transitions that, though the pictures were changed a number of times, neither Henry nor Lucy ever suspected that more than one picture had been displayed. Finally the artist reached a point beyond which he did not dare pass.

From this time there was no further use for likenesses. The young people were constantly together, and in time Lucy Prindle told her father that the son of his old friend had asked for her hand. A ready consent was given both by the Hyland and Prindle families, and the goal was won.

When the wedding came off Mr. Edwin Larned was one of the guests receiving marked attention from the fathers of the bride and of the groom. After the ceremony the three who had made the arrangement at the club went to the supper room, where the two fathers drank to a successful career for the artist. Then each presented him with a check for $10,000 to make that career easier.

NATHAN B. HOWARD.
